

“A cognitive hierarchy of strategic thinking in the lab, field, and brain”

Models of steps of reasoning in strategic games offer a precise supplement = to equilibrium analyses, which may be empirically and practically useful in unfamiliar games (and as initial conditions for learning). This paper describes a class of such theories, with data from simple lab experiments, field settings (Swedish lotteries and movie revenue) and neural activity.