

The Unconscious Consumer

Gavan J. Fitzsimons

Abstract: For many years many researchers (both economists and psychologists) have assumed that consumers are conscious thinking machines. In this talk I'll present a wide variety of evidence that directly challenges this assumption and suggests that in many consumption situations we are guided by both stimuli and processes that occur outside our conscious awareness. At times such effects can be highly adaptive and functional, while in other settings they can be harmful and even destructive.